Hook viewers in the first few seconds you have to grab people’s attention quickly, especially on Twitter, where so much more content competes for the attention of your audience. The good news is that it often takes viewers only one second to be able to remember a memorable video. 2. Reduce longer videos to bite-sized pieces You will make so much effort to create content, it makes sense to get the greatest value from it. Grind longer videos into small, standalone gnettes or GIFs to provide fresher content. Twitter users like to share short content. 3. Put people front and center people react to people. Twitter found that viewer delay doubles when people appear in the first few shots of the video. Short videos targeting people can also help tell your company’s story and introduce your people to your customers by helping to humanize your brand. 4. Don’t be afraid of branding video with catchy branding in the first few seconds attract the most attention, and adding a logo increases acquisition intentions by nine percent. 5. Use signatures to back up your Organization News posts, specifically becoming adept at creating short videos that tell a story well, even if the sound is off. The BBC, for example, uses this technique well. Tommy was bullied in the care home by a boy. Now, at 81, he works through a bucket list and make up for a childhood he never had. pic.twitter.com/DxFOJdJXU bbc stories (@bbcstories) 23 October 2017 6. Twitter videos can help you sell products in a variety of ways, from different uses to videos explaining the way you like. Use Hootsuite to easily plan, post and promote your Twitter videos. You can then interact with your followers from one platform from which you manage all other social channels. Getting started (Pocket-lint) - Twitter and Periscope have just announced that they are now rolling out 360 live video that most likely competes with Facebook Live and Snapchat. Live 360-degree video broadcasts are only available to selected users at the moment, but both companies said the feature will be rolled out globally in the coming weeks. Twitter launches live video: Here’s how to stream from the app You’ll Know the video is shot at 360 because the icon labeled Live 360 will appear on the video. When you watch 360 videos, you’ll be able to change your point of view by moving your phone or touching the screen and scrolling through it. 360 Sunset in Florida. The first ever #Periscope360 of @Brande_ Anthony - Alex Pettitt (@Alexpettitt) 28 December 2016Twitter user Alex Pettitt posted one of the first 360 live videos and to view it you’ll need to open it via the Twitter app on his phone. What’s not clear is how you shoot the 360 video, as neither Twitter nor Periscope have said how it’s done. Presumably only users who are able to shoot them know at the moment. If you’re interested in shooting in 360 videos, then you can sign up for a Periscope waiting list to receive notifications about when the feature is available and ready to use. Writing by Max Langridge. August 25, 2017 2:31 PM ET Order Reprints Print Articles Getty Images Videos may be the future for social media, but one analyst thinks Twitter’s expanded live offerings are too little, too late. Jefferies analyst Brent Thill downgraded Twitter shares to hold on Friday based on his belief that the social network’s recently inked deals with a host of media players still won’t help him truly compete with rivals when it comes to acquiring advertising dollars. Twitter’s push to be a digital video provider live is interesting, but we note that larger competitors like Facebook and Google have much stronger digital video offerings for advertisers with much larger and more engaged user bases, deeper granulated data for targeting, and a proven return on advertiser investment. Till writes. Twitter’s user base has stalled as of late, with the company recently reported no growth in its monthly active user count from the first quarter to the second quarter. The company has also tried to increase its revenue, and investors are looking for both of these metrics to rebound. We think this turnaround will take longer than originally expected. Till writes. He believes Snap, which has its own challenges attracting new users and advertisers, is better positioned given that it offers marketers more creative ways to push through its products. Snap is the best way to recreate the explosion of millennial digital video consumption, he says. Twitter promotions 1.5% on Friday. Big Picture: An analyst thinks Twitter is right to bet on video, but still believes the company will have trouble competing for dollar ads against its big rivals. Video could be the future of the future social media, but one analyst thinks Twitter’s expanded live offerings are too little, too late. An error occurred, try again later. Thank you This article has been sent to Twitter becoming increasingly broadcast-friendly with the launch of a live video API that will allow large media companies to live stream using professional video equipment. According to TechCrunch, the live API will allow major broadcasters to implement Twitter’s own live streams starting March 21. While Periscope Producer allows half-forward live streams, creating a URL for live streaming from other programs like Wirecast, the API is more customizable. An API is a form of code that allows a website or app to communicate with a third-party application. In the case of Twitter, Wirecast and Livestream Switcher, as well as a live Mevo camera are already on board integrating live video on the social media platform directly from their apps. For broadcasting, the API means that even news vans may be able to live stream on Twitter. For Twitter users, the change likely means an increase in live content to watch, as the API is likely to encourage larger media companies to use Twitter for live streaming. The expanded live streaming capability comes after Twitter launched a live stream without the need for a second live streaming app late last year - and continues to raise questions about Periscope’s future. The company’s dedicated live streaming app allowed users to stream live on Twitter before this live integration. Now Periscope is not a necessary download for live streaming on Twitter, although features in the app are still powered by Periscope. Camera manufacturers, however, still use Periscope to allow live streaming directly from their equipment, including drone manufacturer DJI. As Twitter battles Facebook and Instagram for live video, the API could help larger media companies share more live streams in this space. The API is likely another step to encourage more live content, along the same lines as Twitter’s licensing agreements for major events, including a nightly deal with the NFL. Facebook, however, launched its own API for live video nearly a year ago. Recommendations of editors Weihnachten mit HGTV Darber Freit Sich Jeder! Waynechten mit HGTV Dray Idine!
